the earliest in the Pacific to fish for deep ocean species such as tuna, marlin, and mahimahi.

Their knowledge extended across reef, shoreline, and open sea, with a wide range of practices that included everything from constructing various types of stone gigao (fish weirs) to offshore techniques like the poi'u.

But beyond its technical brilliance, the poi'u tells a deeper story. It speaks to a way of life where knowledge and skill was passed down through generations, effort was collective, and success was measured not only in what was caught, but in how it was shared.

Today, while some of these practices, such as fishing with the poi'u, have faded or changed, efforts to learn them again provide an opportunity to reconnect with and learn from the wisdom of the past.
